

Local public radio is fairly responsive to public input with notable exceptions. Local news coverage on the radio is very limited and there should be lots more. Local television news is cookie-cutter, but more prevalent than local news radio. Local television does not serve the local population in very much except mind candy programs. Even PBS is becoming common and commercial. I don't know if cable is under FCC jurisdiction, but they have been cutting local channels recently and are not doing as much community outreach as I think is healthy for a medium-size city like ours.
